Appendix	52

Over the past few years, there has been growing interest in understanding rural America and using that understanding to build a politics that better serves rural people and the nation as a whole. Driven in part by the intensely “red-blue” geographical sorting that has taken place across much of the country, more and more people are seeking to make a productive difference: as progressives working to find common ground on issues, Democrats seeking to overcome de facto one-party rule in the countryside, or local people fighting to rebuild rural economies and communities hollowed out by destructive trade policies, corporate consolidation and long-term disinvestment.

This Resource Directory offers a point of entry for people hoping to better understand rural America and to get involved with groups working to change things for the better. A joint project of the Rural Urban Bridge Initiative (RUBI) and The Democratic Strategist (TDS), the Directory includes more than 120 organizations which are either rural-based, rural-focused or significantly include rural concerns among their priorities. Some of these organizations are regional or multistate, while others are national in scope, though we only include a small sampling of such groups. A handful work within a single state or are focused in a particular rural area.

The groups listed in the directory are organized into nine categories, each describing the type of work on which they are primarily focused (Note that several work in multiple categories, but are listed only once). The nine categories are:

1. Progressive rural electoral organizing
2. Multi-issue rural community organizing
3. Rural voter protection and registration
4. Rural candidate support and campaign resources
5. Rural economic development
6. Rural policy advocacy
7. Rural news and media
8. Depolarization
9. Identity-based rural organizing

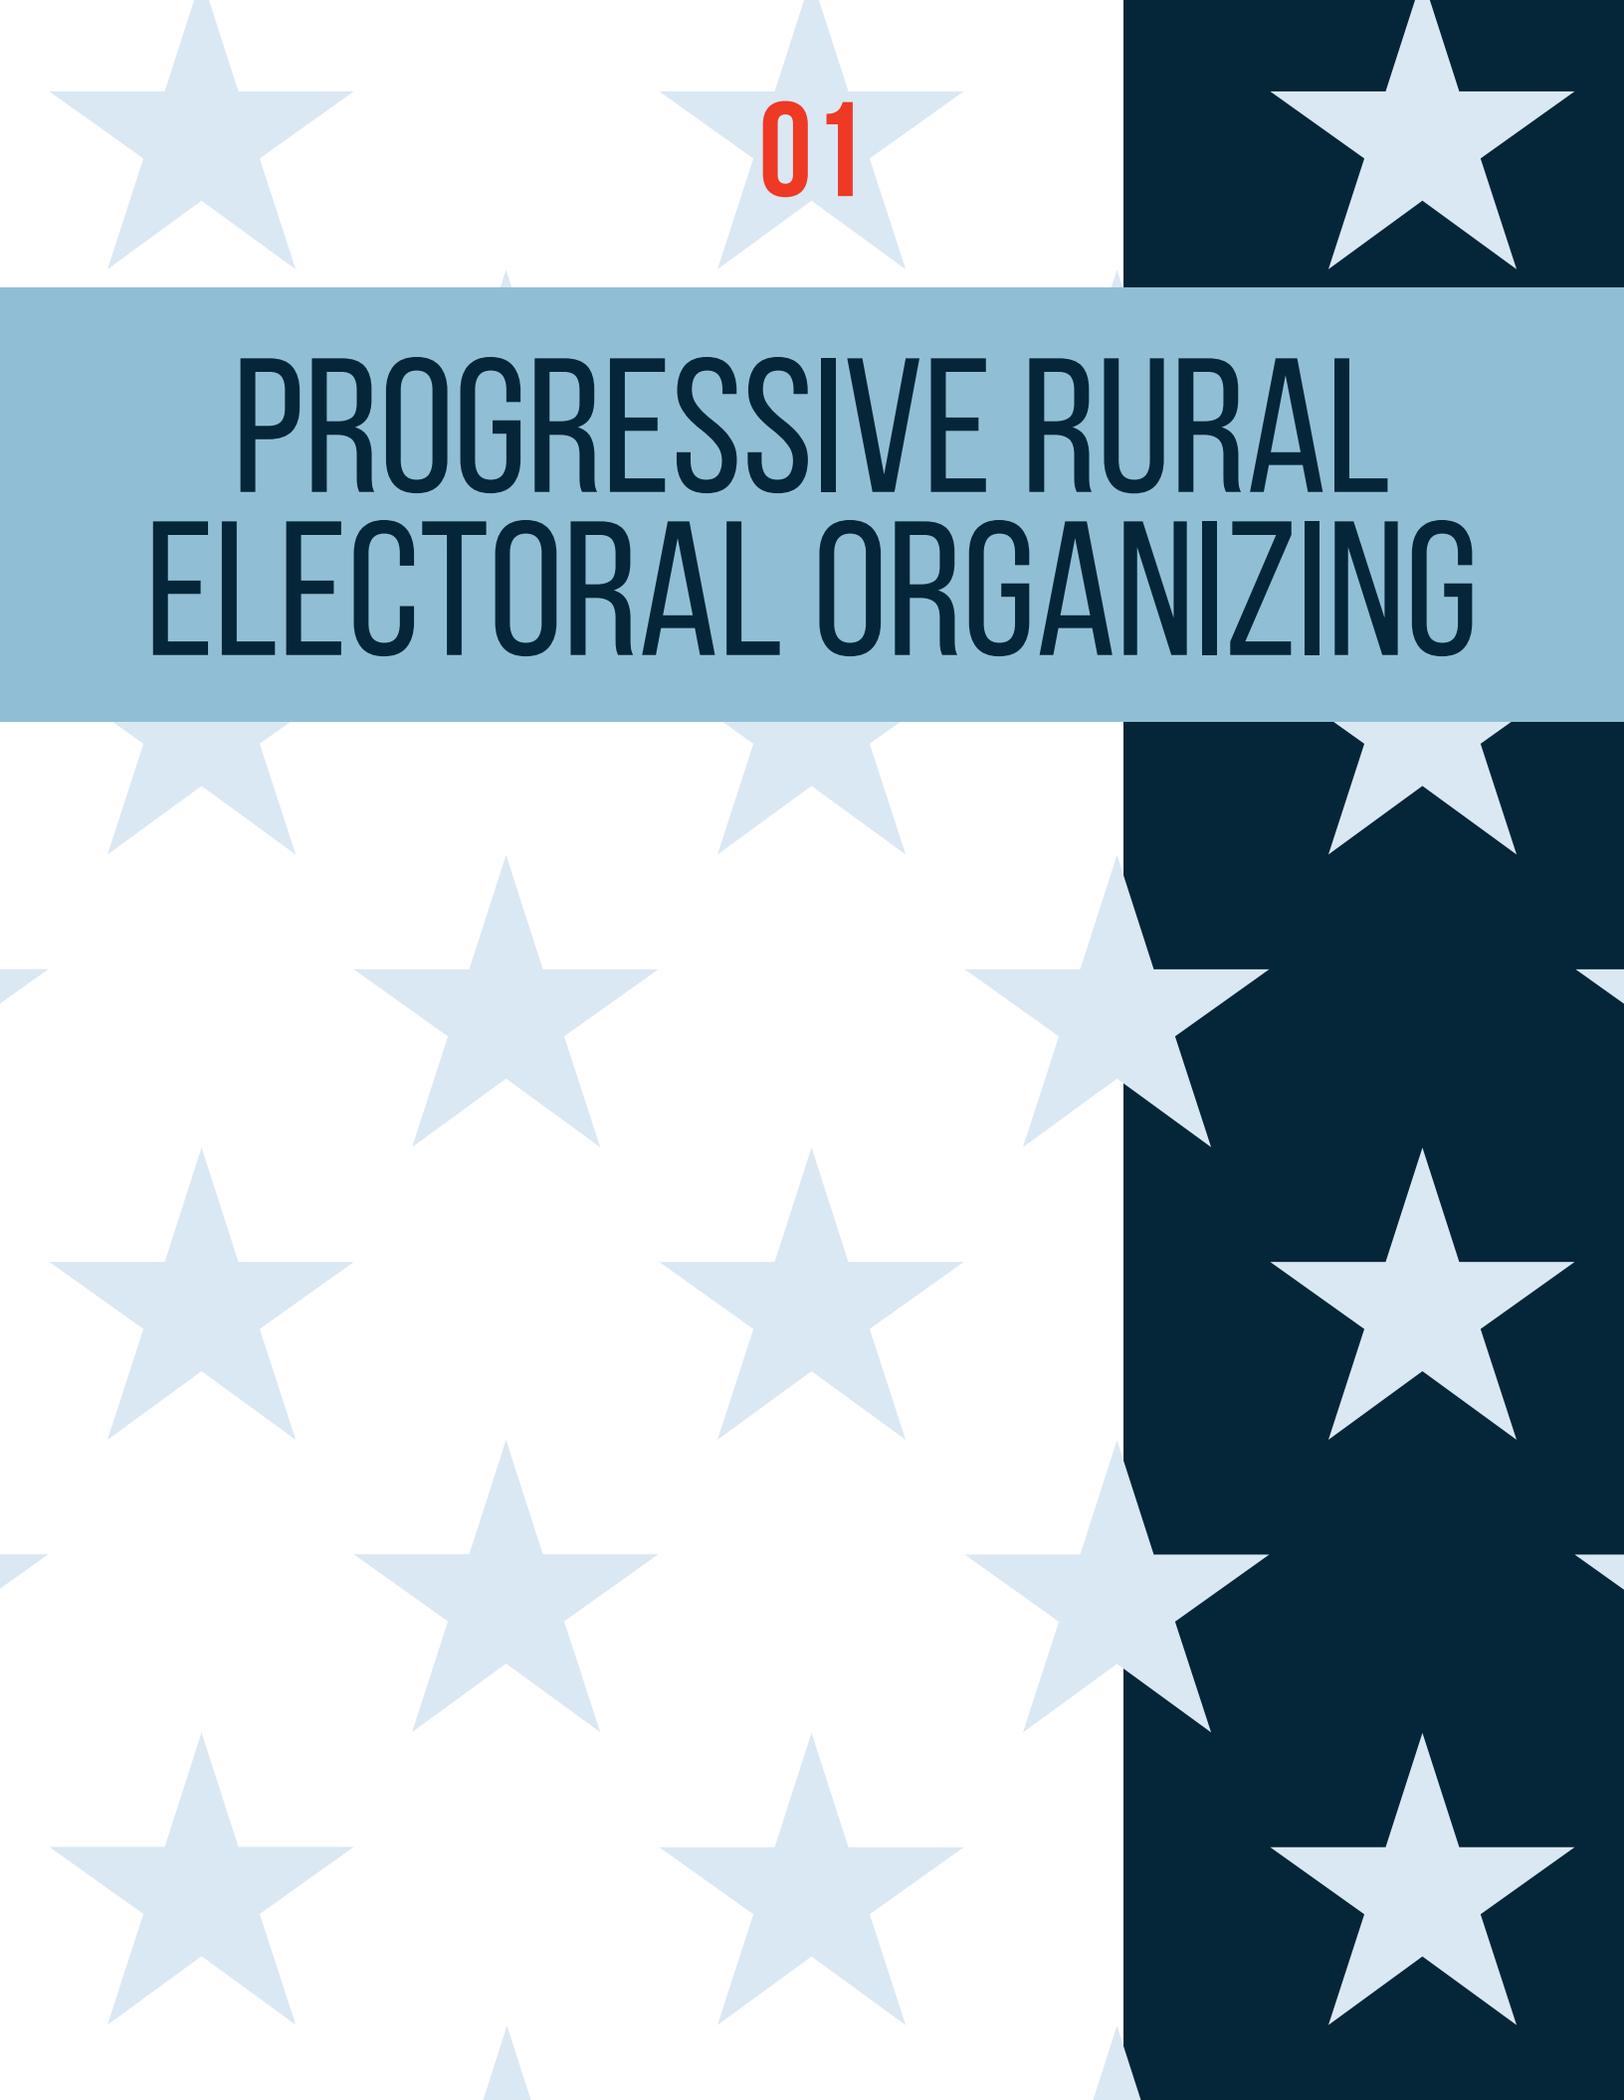

While we undertook considerable research to identify the groups listed in this Directory, we understand that the list is certainly not exhaustive. For that reason, RUBI and TDS hope to update the Directory periodically. Related to the above, we decided to focus primarily on groups doing electoral, political, communications and organizing work, rather than those focused on rural economic or community development, as the latter includes literally hundreds of local and regional organizations who were simply too numerous for us to include given our limited time and resources for this project. There is, in fact, an extraordinary array of groups across the country doing effective, often transformative rural development work. It is with regrets that we cannot include them here, beyond the handful of national rural development groups we mention.

APPENDIX TO RURAL DIRECTORY:

A SAMPLING OF PERSPECTIVES AND RESOURCES FOR UNDERSTANDING AND EFFECTIVE ACTION IN RURAL AMERICA

Many of the organizations listed in the Directory do research, track and compile data and publish information, analyses or commentaries. This includes the co-producers of the Directory, The Democratic Strategist (TDS) and the Rural Urban Bridge Initiative (RUBI). Because our understanding of rural people, voters, politics and communities is constantly evolving, both TDS and RUBI believe it is critical to stay abreast of new research and insights, especially regarding what works in strengthening rural communities and winning rural people to progressive ideas and candidates. For these reasons, we offer below a sampling of some of the available research, resources and analyses, followed by three thoughtful commentaries which readers might find useful.

I. A sampling of available research and resources

- “The Rural Urban Divide: A Guidebook to Understanding the Problem and Forging Solutions”

This Guidebook, assembled by RUBI, focuses on the underlying causes of the rural urban divide as well as strategies for overcoming what divides us. It includes perspectives of more than twenty different authors and organizers.

- “Can Democrats Succeed in Rural America?”

Released in November, 2022, this report from RUBI has two parts: A distillation of a wide body of research into why and how Democrats lost rural and working-class voters, and what works to regain their support; and a summary of what in rural campaigns, based upon interviews with fifty Democratic candidates who ran for state or federal office in rural districts between 2016 and 2020.

- “Rural Policy Action Report”

Growing out of a national convening organized by the Rural Democracy Initiative, Rural Organizing.org and Family Farm Action, this report provides a comprehensive and detailed set of progressive policy recommendations designed to increase rural prosperity, resiliency and ecological sustainability. More than fifty rural leaders and experts participated in developing the analysis and recommendations. A follow up report, focused on state-level policy is also available at the site.

- “Winning Jobs Narrative”

The “Winning Jobs Narrative” is a field-tested strategy for effectively communicating progressive policy stances to working-class and rural people across race, by putting workers and work at the center of policy discussions. Developed by the Rural Democracy Initiative and several partners, the WJN is being utilized in both rural urban campaigns around the country and has been embraced by a number of progressive leaders and elected officials.

II. Why we’ve lost working-class and rural voters, and how to win them back: Three perspectives

Joan Williams, “How Democrats Can Win Non-college Educated Voters Without Giving In to Racism”, Originally published in The Hill, June, 2023, excerpted below

The diploma divide has been extensively documented: Democrats lose, or win only narrowly, because noncollege voters of all races are moving right. Progressives often assume that attracting noncollege voters means pandering to racism. New research shows that this is false.

Racism is definitely part of the picture: racial resentment was highly predictive of voting for Trump in 2016. But that’s not why he won, a new study shows. He won because he also attracted a much larger group of voters with moderate levels of racial resentment. A prior study found that 2016, 19 percent of Trump voters polled as “anti-elites” with moderate views on race, immigration, gay marriage and the environment. If Democrats could peel off even a modest percentage of anti-elites, they could win handily in both presidential and congressional elections...

Last week, Bette Midler tweeted that the people of West Virginia are “poor, illiterate and strung out.” Donald Trump should send her a thank-you note.

Right-wing populists – who pretend to honor working-class voters while serving the interests of the richest Americans – hit electoral pay dirt every time an urban elitist denigrates rural, working people...

Andrew Levison, “Three Important Facts about Rural Areas that Democratic Candidates and Political Strategists Need to Understand”, offered in its entirety here:

1. Rural political districts are widely diverse and any “One Size Fits All” political strategy will inevitably miss the mark.

The two photos that inevitably illustrate the text of most political articles about rural areas are of wheat fields and cattle ranches. In reality, however, there are actually a very wide range of very distinct rural areas with equally distinct social and political characteristics.

Agricultural areas alone range from Florida districts where oranges and other citrus fruits are harvested to California districts where lettuce, grapes, tomatoes and other vegetables are grown and other areas devoted to tobacco, soybeans, corn and wheat. Other rural areas are devoted to resource extraction and exploitation - strip and open-pit mining, fracking, natural gas and oil well operation, commercial timber and fishing operations and, increasingly, the rapidly growing outdoor recreation and tourism industries. A third distinct rural environment are places where manufacturing and food processing facilities are located: industrial plants that fled from urban areas in previous decades, carpet and furniture making factories and poultry, pork and beef processing facilities. All these areas are “unmistakably rural” but the communities and cultures that exist around them are so significantly different from each other that they create substantial differences in social and cultural outlook.

For Democratic political strategy the key fact is this: No single generic rural “message” or organizing strategy can adequately capture the distinct local “flavor” of these communities without sounding out of touch and unconvincing.

2. Rural small towns have deep social divisions between a rural economic elite and the working class population

As an article in The U.K. Guardian noted:

A class of local elites owns the valuable land that surrounds a typical rural small town, which is home to a post office, public schools, a grocery store, and sometimes a hospital... the owners of physical assets – fast food franchises, apartment complexes, car dealerships – make up the rest of this scaled-down hierarchy. They sit on local non-profit boards, run the chamber of commerce, and are influential members of their churches. They often hold elected office and are disproportionately responsible for the political constitution of rural areas.¹

Beneath this rural elite there are a wide variety of working-class occupations, ranging from farm and ranch workers and foremen to truck drivers, feedlot, storage facility and warehouse workers, mechanics and repairmen and regional concentrations of lumber workers, fishermen, oil pipeline and refinery workers, strip mine and open-pit mine workers, forestry employees, firefighters and others.

Both the business and resource owners and the people who work for them in these places share a clear “rural consciousness” of themselves as “country people” rather than “city people” and have a widespread resentment of the latter. But there is also a substantial difference between their outlooks. The first group is the natural, quite passionate base of the Republican Party while the working people have a wider range of views.

In formulating progressive and Democratic strategy it is important to clearly focus messaging and outreach on the second group in particular, that is working-class rural people.

3. Rural voters are largely Republican but they are not all staunch ideological conservatives or MAGA extremists.

To begin with, there are very significant pockets of Democratic support in rural areas. Latinos in Texas and the Southwest, African-Americans in the “Black Belt” of rural counties that stretches from Georgia to Louisiana and Native American communities in many areas of the West, Southwest and Mountain West remain majority democratic (although among Latinos there has been some slippage in recent years).

But on a deeper level it is crucial to recognize that while a very daunting majority of white rural workers now vote for the GOP, they are not all staunch ideological conservatives or MAGA extremists.

The basic, very widely shared political outlook in rural America is properly called cultural traditionalism. It is a perspective shaped by the major social institutions in rural life – the church, the military, the local business community and the version of the American system of government taught in traditional High School civics classes. The values it endorses are religious piety, patriotism, small business/free enterprise and constitutional democracy.

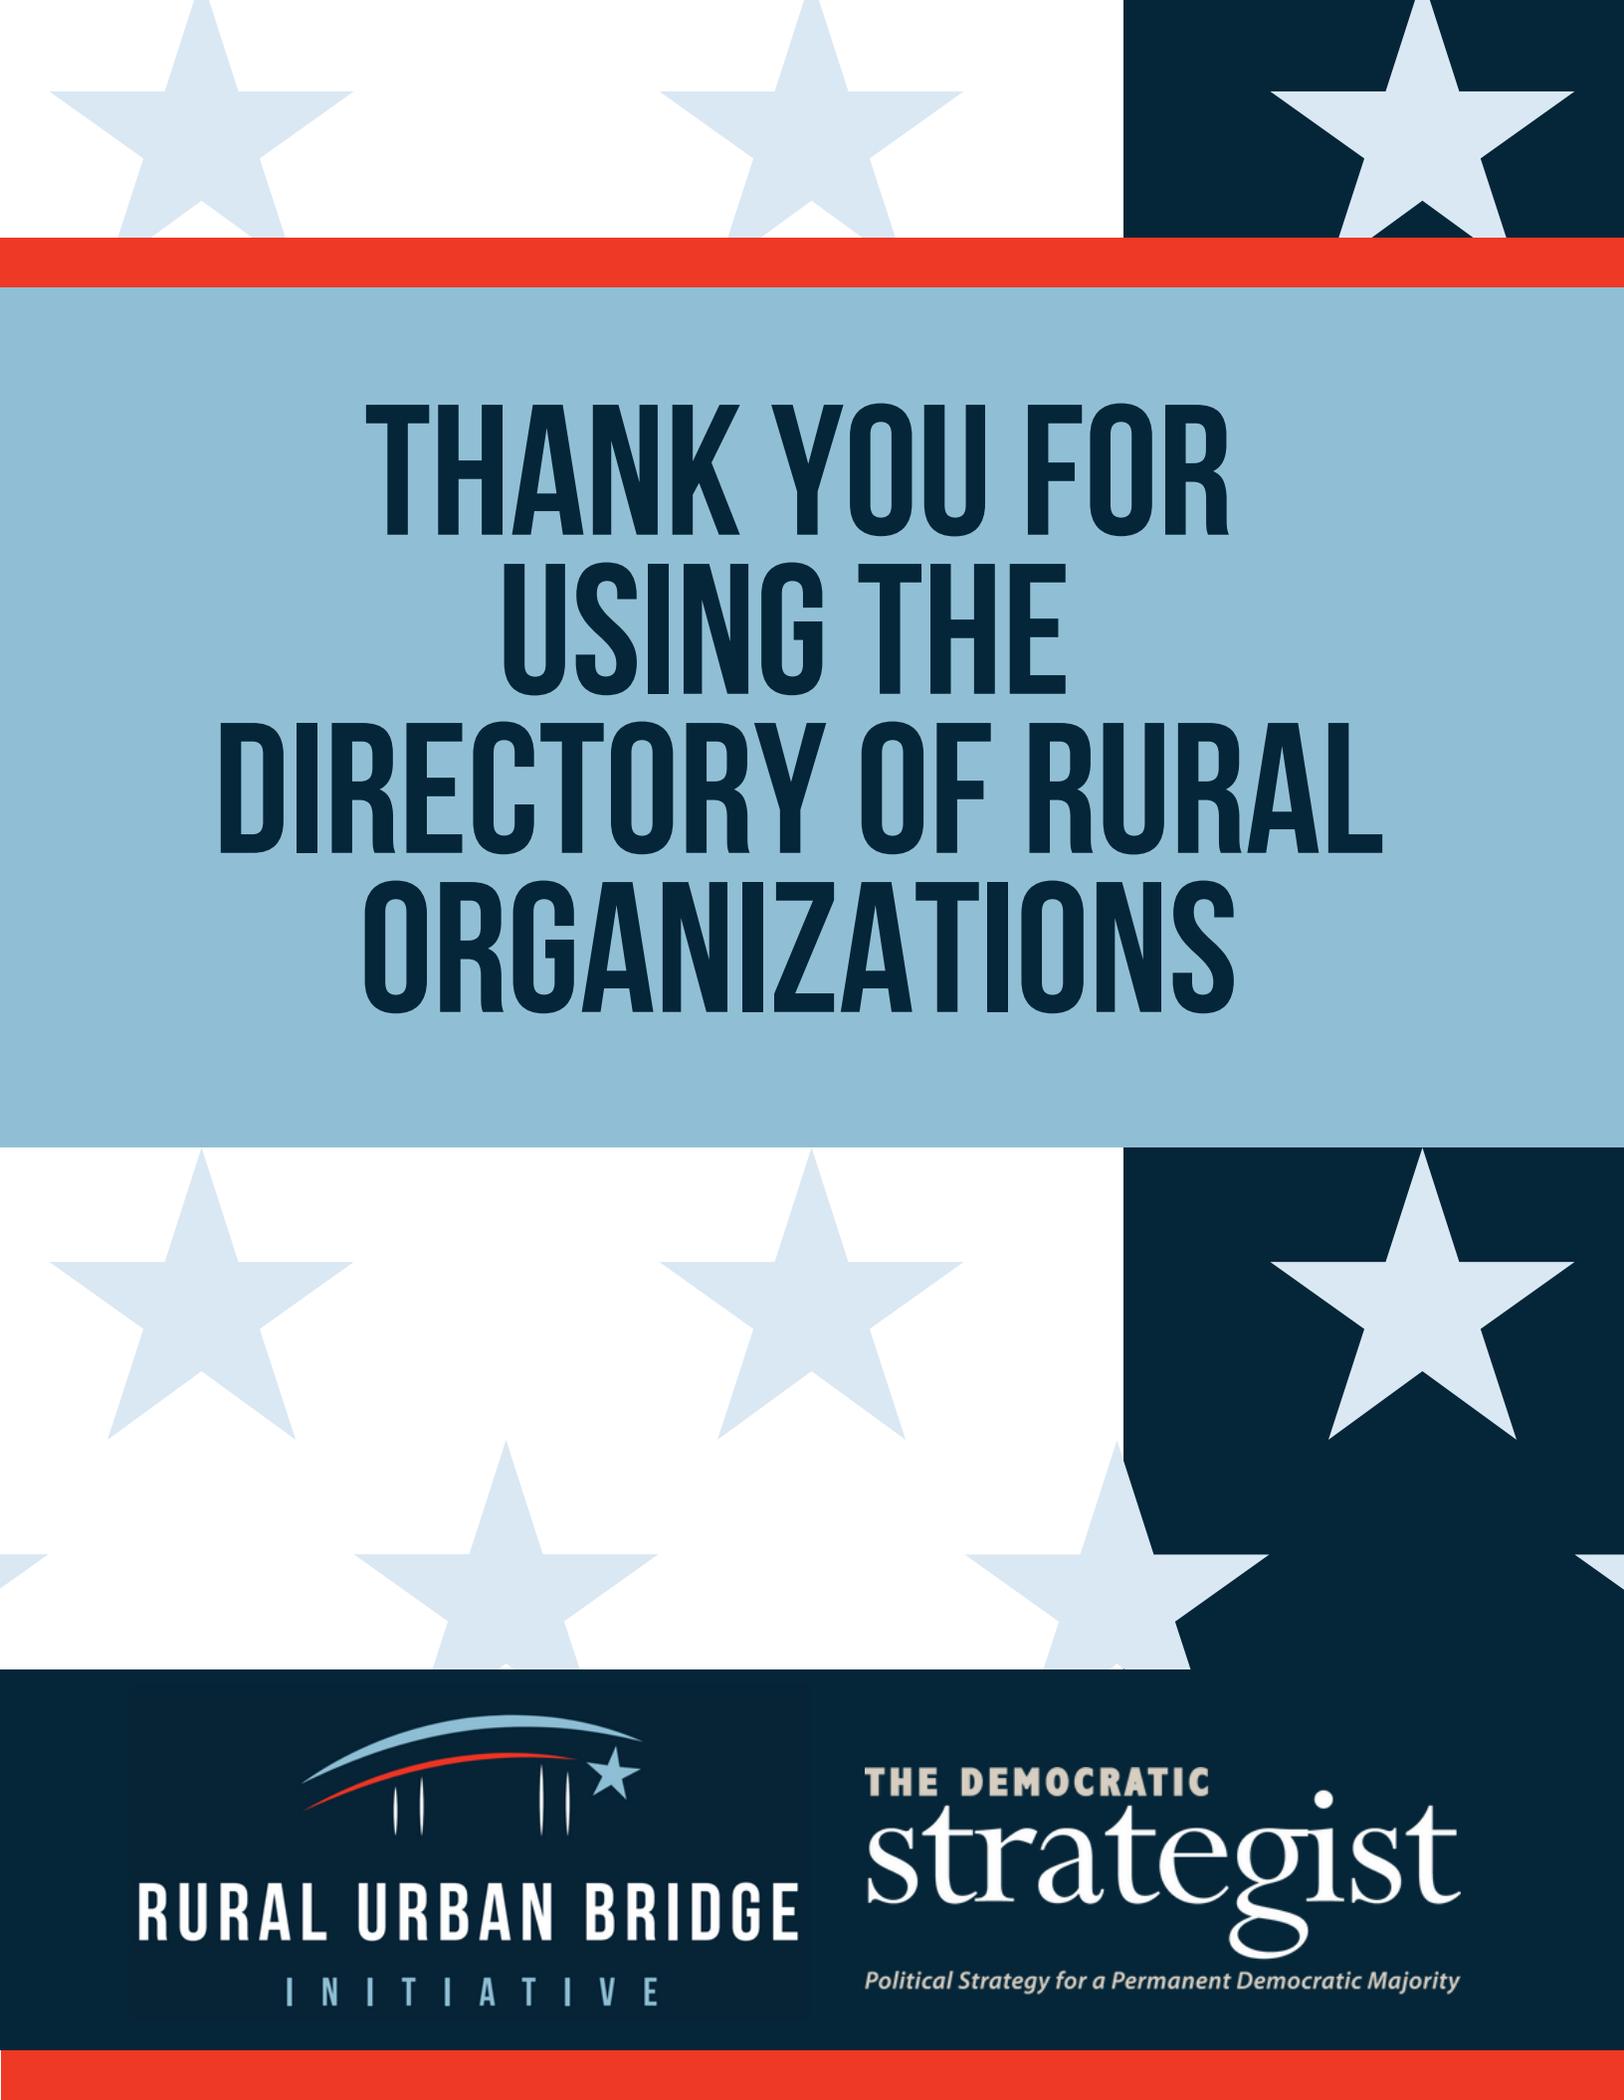

These same values are shared by many people in urban America as well but whereas people who live in urban areas are clearly aware that there are people with a range of different values and ideas who live around them, people in rural areas find these traditional values to be almost universally held and therefore see them as obvious “common sense” or “what everybody just knows” rather than as a specific perspective.

In the post-World War II era in rural areas liberal and progressive “New Deal” democrats like Hubert Humphrey and George McGovern were able to succeed because they combined their progressive social and economic views with an understanding and respect for the basic cultural traditionalism of the districts and voters they represented.

But today there is also an important distinction between MAGA extremists who hold racially biased, theocratic, and bitterly anti-liberal views on the one hand and others who were raised with a more tolerant and compassionate “Judge not lest ye be judged” version of Christianity (one which is still widespread in rural America) and an instinctive “populist” distrust of business and politicians.

For progressives and Democrats the key to effective rural organizing is to carefully follow a basic two level approach. On the one hand candidates should show a clear understanding and respect for many rural voters' basic cultural traditionalism, even in cases where they disagree with it on specific issues, while at the same time drawing clear distinctions between the extremism of the MAGA supporters and the more tolerant and economically populist views of non-extremist rural Americans. For progressive and Democratic political strategy the basic fact is that the MAGA supporters in rural America cannot be persuaded; a significant group of non-MAGA rural voters can.

The recent report by the Rural-Urban Bridge Initiative Can Democrats Succeed in Rural America? A Review of Strategies & Practices that Work is a companion study to this directory that offers a wealth of specific examples of how this approach can be applied in practice. Every prospective Democratic candidate who wants to run in rural districts should read and apply it as a key resource for their campaign.
